- disadvantage but turn to advantage (counterargument)

While there are competing products out there for homeowners to manage their household, nothing quite competes with the interconnectivity and ease of use that HavenScan provides. HavenScan allows for continuous data collection and layered responses that interweave feedback from different segments in order to give the homeowner precise actionable feedback that they can implement before it's too late. Additionally, the piece of mind and simplification that comes with migrating all house monitors to one platform is simply unparalleled.

Some may feel like HavenScan is an unnecessary expense, or one that is more cost efficient from separate providers. Well, home inspections cost around $400 dollars on average, which are recurring costs every 1-5 years. This is far above the material cost of HavenScan, as well as the cost avoidance prospect since continuous monitoring highlights issues before they become expensive fixes. Short-term homebuyers may think that this product is not useful for them since they are soon to move out before issues impact them. However, when the short term homebuyer decides to sell their house, unforeseen issues can come forth during the home inspection which can cause deals to fall through and price renegotiations to occur, impacting the seller's bottom line. By investing in a product like HavenScan, the seller can preemptively address these issues and fix them in a way no other product can compete with.

Finally, as the first innovation of its sort, HavenScan carries a significant advantage as a pioneer. With the data that HavenScan collects, it can continuously iterate upon feedback and improve the detection models to maintain an edge over the competition and build consumer trust. HavenScan positions itself as a helpful consultant to give homeowners the peace of mind and estate control that they deserve.
